The Polynesian Race,

"On that very morning Kelea and her attendants had gone down to the beach to enjoy the sport of surf-bathing. Swimming out beyond the surf, she encountered the cance, and was at first somewhat surprised and startled at seeing strangers in it, but being reassured by their kindly speech, and being invited to come on board, the messengers offered to ride the cance ashore through the surfasport as exciting as that of swimming on the surf-board. Kelea accepted the invitation, and gallantly the cance shot over the foaming surfand landed safely on the beach. All sense of danger or mistrust being dispelled, the princess accompanied the cance again out over the surf, and again rode successfully ashore over the brakers, the attendants hurning lustily at the brave and fearless style in which the cance was handled. The messengers having by this time ascertained who their lilustrious guest was, invited her to another trip through the roaring surf. Thoughtlessly she consented, and the cance pulled out beyond the surf, watching for a good, high, combing roller of the sea to start in with. At this moment a squall or a whirlwand suddenly strack the cance, coming from off the shore, and away sped the cance with its fair and involuntary passenger over the broad ocean. When the storm subsided, the shores of Maul were far distant, and the messengers started for Wainlan Kelea was taken up to Lihue, where Lo-Lale received her with the regard due to a chiefens of her raint, and as he did not commit suicide, it may be inferred that she became reconciled to her lot and accepted him as her husband. And as no invasion of Oahu was ever attempted by Hawaokaobele, or vengeance canced for the abduction of his sister, it is probable, though the legend says nothing about it, that the affair was diplomatically settled to the satisfaction of all parties."

Intant Lihne did not suit a lady who was so fond of aquatic sports, and she finally determined The Polynesian Race, of all parties."

Inland Lihne did not suit a lady who was so fond of aquatic sports, and she finally determined to leave Lo-Lale and wander forth in quest of adventures. Lo-Lale composed a very beautiful cliant, expressive of his grief, commencing, "Farewell, my partner on the lowland plains," and concluding with "Dimness covers my eyes. Wee is me! Oh!" but he could not touch her heart, and she went. The following extract tells us how she picked up her next husband:

"Loving Thine, Welson decembed to Even and she went. The following extract tells us how she picked up her next husband:

"Leaving Lihue, Kelea descended to Ewa, and skirting the head of the lagoon by way of Halawa, arrived at the mouth of Pearl river opposite Punloa, and found a crowd of idlers, nobles and retainers of Kalamakua, the high chief of that region, disporting themselves in the surf. Borrowing a surf-board from one of the bystanders, Kelea jumped in the sea and swam out beyond the breakers and joined the company of the other surf-bathers. When the surf broke at its highest, they all started for the shore, and Kelea excelled them all, and was loudly cheered for her daring and skill. Kalamakua, being at the time in a neighboring plantation, heard the loud uproar of voices from the shore, and inquired what the cause of it was. He was told that a beautiful woman from Lihue had beaten all the Halawa chiefs at surf-swimming and hence the loud and continued cheering. Satisfied in his own mind that but one woman at Lihue could perform such a feat, and that she must be his coustin, Lo-Lale's wife, the Maui chiefess, Kalamakua went at once to the beach, and threw his kibei (mantle) over Kelea as she touched the slore, returning from another victorious trip through the surf. Explanations followed, and Kelea was borne home if state to the residence of Kalamakua in Halawa, and became his wife. With him she remained to her death."

Judge Fornander closes his third division of Judge Formander crosses his third division of Hawaiian history with the death of Kalaniopau; it is a period which presents a broader field to the historian; the legends are fuller, more reliable; the historian figures come out with sharper out lines, and towards the close of the period the firm as a man, and not as a mere name:

"After Lono had left his royal host in the evening and retired to rest, either that the thoughts of the Kalaupapa affair troubled his mind, or that the heat of the night made it uncomfortable to sleep in the house, he got up and went down to the beach to sleep in his cance, where the cool breeze off the sea would fan and refresh him.

"While there, another double cauce arrived during the night from Kauai, baving on board a chiefess named Ohalkawilinia, bound to Hawaii on a visit. Lono accosted the stranger, inquired chiefess named Ohatkawilinia, bound to Hawaii on a visit. Lono accosted the stranger, inquired the news from Kanai, and in course of conversation learned that a new mele or chant had just been composed in honor of this chiefess' name; that it was only known to a few of the highest chiefs on Kanai, and had not yet become public. Prompted by curiosity and a natural bent for acquiring all sorts of knowledge, Lono entreated the chiefess to repeat the chant, which she complainantly did, and Lono's quick ear and retentive memory soon caught and correctly retained the whole of it. The chant was well known to Hawaiians of the last generation, and many of the present may recall it to mind by hearing the first line:

"The salt pond of Mana. "His expected sleep on the beach having been thus interrupted, Lono returned to the house and sleept soundly till late in the morning. "Eakthiltews, having enjoyed an uninterrupted night's rest, rose early next morning and repaired to the sensione for a bath, according to the custo the seashore for a bath, according to the custom. He there found the cance of the Kanai chiefess getting ready to leave. Saluting the stranger, he also inquired the latest news from Kanai, and received the same information that Lono had received during the night, of which fact, however, Kakuhihewa was ignorant. Having repeated the chant to Kakuhihewa, and he having committed it to memory, the Kanai chiefess made sail and departed, and Kakuhihewa returned to his palace much pieased at the opportunity of puzzing his guest, when he should awake, with the latest news from Kanai. When Lono fine it, awoke and made his appearance, Kakuhihewa returned him to chant the latest meis form Kanai. Without hesitation Lono complied, and recited the clash correctly from beginning to end, to the great discomintare and perpicuity of Kakuhihewa."

Passing by a number of chiefs, we come to chant correctly from beginning to end, to the great discomiture and perpiculty of Kakuhikewa," Passing by a number of chiefs, we come to Alapai-Nui, during whose reign, on one stormy night, Kamehameha the Great was born. Alapai occupies an important place in the history. The birth of Kamehameha enables the Judge once more to give an approximate date; and we find ourselves between the years 1736 and 1740. Alapsi was a great warrior, and made conquests in Mani and Molokai. He histwise made an attempt on Oahu, but the expedition came to naught. We get into a perfect whirt of battles, invasions, skirmishes, revolutions, and murders, as we turn overpage after page; and the picture becomes dark, almost wearisome, when we suddenly come upon the episode of the visit of Captain Cook to the Islands in 1778. Judge Fornander's account of this important event is a very valuable one; he handles his subject in an extremely fair and impartial manner; he throws considerable light upon the actions of the great navigator by appealing to Hawaiian tradition; he is not carried away by prejudice, and altogether we would recommend any one wishing to have a thorough knowledge of the circumstances of the event, to turn to the Judge's pages. We are glad to be able to quote the following paragraph, which sums up the argument as to whether Cook had any previous knowledge of the teams of the proposition of the great paying at all, they convert the proposition of the proposition of the lalands:

"He these words mean anything at all, they convert the proposition of the proposi

"If these words mean anything at all, they convey the unavoidable inference that Cook had no previous knowledge of the existence of the group. To argue the contrary, as Mr. Jarres has done, is to accuse Cook of a hypocrisy and disingenuousness that his works give no warrant for, and of which competent men who can appreciate the real traits of his character will acquit him."

It is impossible in the limits of an article to

It is impossible, in the limits of an article, to give any fair sketch of the Judge's views upon Cook. He takes great pains to confute the charge of self-defication which has been brought against Captain Cook; at the same time he reprobates many of Cook's actions—his greed, his migrardliness, "his disregard of the proprieties of ordinary intercourse," and his "wanton insulf" to the religious sentiments of the Hawaisans by carrying off the fence from the height. At the conclusion of his account dedge Formander says:

"Thus and at the orionde of Loue (Cantain

Cook), but its influence on the Hawaiian people was leading and will long be remembered. He earne as a god, and in the untutored minds of the natives, was werehipped as such; but his death dispelled the illusion; and by those, whom he might have so largely benefited, he is only remembered for the quantity of iron that for the first time was so abundantly scattered over the country, and for the introduction of a previously unknown and terrible disease. As education and intelligence are spreading, however, among the natives, they will gradually learn to appreciate the benefits that have followed and will continue to follow in the wake of his first discovery. The reproaches that have been levelled at his memory will gradually fade, as men learn to judge others according to the standard of the times and the exceptional circumstances under which they lived and had to det; and while time will eradicate the evils attributed to Cook's arrival, time will also bring into paster provinence the advantages and blessings, the light and the knowledge, to which his discovery opened the portals, and enable future historians, be they native or foreign, to draw a truer, more just, and more generous balance. In contemplating what the Hawaiians were one hundred years ago and what they are this day, no candid person can fail to kindly remember the man who first tore the veil of isolation that for centuries had shrouded the Hawaiians in deeper and deeper growing darkness, who brought them in relation with the civilized world, and who pointed the way for others to bring them that knowledge which is power and that light which is life."

Turning from Hawaii and the episode of Cook, Judge Fornander devotes a considerable space to which is power and that light which is life."

Turning from Hawaii and the episode of Cook, Judge Fornander devotes a considerable space to the history of Mani and of Oahu. The most striking feature in this part is the reign of Kabekill in Mani, a perfect Machiavelli in Hawaiian politics, who by means of a crafty and insidious policy managed to acquire the sovereignty of Oahu. Kabahana, the legitimate Moi of Oahu, had gradually been estranged from his best advisers by the arts of Kabekihi, and in the beginning of 1783 the Moi of Mani sailed against him. Kahahania was besten in battle, and after wandering for two years among the mountains of Oahu, was finally betrayed to his foe and killed. In connection with this invasion a legend of daring has come down which is well worth repeating:

"When the news of the invasion spread to Ewa come down which is well worth repeating:

"When the news of the invasion spread to Ewa and Waialua, eight famous warriors from those piaces, whose names the legend has retained, concerted an expedition on their own account to win distinction for their bravery and inflict what damage they could on Kahe-ili's forces. It was a chivalrous undertaking, a forlorn hope, and wholly unauthorized by Kahahana, but fully within the spirit of the time for personal valor, andacity, and total disrogard of consequences. Starting direct from Apnakehan in Waikiki, where Kahakili's army was in camp and organizing preparatory to total disregard of consequences. Starting direct from Apuakehau in Waikiki, where Kahekili's army was in camp and organizing preparatory to a march inland to fight Kahahana, the eight Oahn warriors boldly charged a large contingent of several annored men of the Maul troops collected at the heiau. In a twinkling they were surrounded by overwhelming numbers, and a fight commenced to which Hawaiian legends record no parallel. Using their long spears and javelins with marvellous skill and dexterity, and killing a prodigious number of their enemies, the eight champions broke through the circle of spears that surrounded them. But Makaioulu, one of the warriors, though a good fighter, was a bad runner, on account of his short bow-legs, and he was overtaken by Kauhikoakoa, a Maul chief. Makaioulu was soon tripped up, secured, and bound by Kauhikoakoa, who, swinging the captive up on his own shoulders, started off with him for the camp to have him sacrificed as the first victim of the war. This affair took place on the bank of the Punalun tare patch, near the cocoanut grove of Kuakuaaka. Makaioulu, thus hoisted on the back of his scaptor, caught sight of his friend Pupuka, and called out to him to throw his spear straight at the naval of his stomach. In hopes of shortening the present and prospective tortures of his friend, and knowing well what his fate would be if brought alive into the enemy's camp, Papuka did as he was bidden and with an unerring aim. But Makaioulu, seeing the spear coming, threw himself with a violeut effort on one side, and the spear went through the back of Kanhikoakos. Seeing their leader fall, the Maui soldiers desisted from farther purauit, and the eight champions escaped."

During Kehekili's soversignty La Perouse visited the secant conting the wall and the lawaiians.
